Abstract

In the current world, the environmental crisis and climate change have become a global challenge. This crisis is not only scientific and technological, but also a deep moral and philosophical crisis. This article analyzes how human life, morality and existence are closely related to environmental protection. To analyze human moral responsibility in the context of environmental protection and climate change is one of its goals. Modern industrialization, consumerism and technology-dependent life are causing environmental disasters, and climate change has become a global crisis. In this context, the question arises: how and to what extent are humans responsible for nature? In the philosophical interpretation, it can be seen that human responsibility for the environment is not only practical or economic, but it is a moral question. In the global context, it is very important to explore the moral basis of human role in preserving the natural environment and our responsibility to future generations. There is no alternative to implementing moral ideals in ensuring a safe and sustainable world for future generations by establishing a balanced relationship with nature. This article states that it is important to give priority to a moral perspective in environmental protection. Along with laws, policies, and technology, we need a change in attitude - one that will bring people back from a consumerist mindset to a principle of coexistence.
